Social Media Is Ruining You We like to talk about productivity, but today's article is about efficiency, not productivity. Efficiency is doing the right things; productivity is doing things right. Efficiency is about getting the most out of what you do; putting in the least amount of work possible and still getting the best possible outcome. That's how you get an efficient system built. When you look at social media platforms like Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram, it seems like they're built to take the most out of your time. They're always pushing notifications relentlessly. And if you don't see one that catches your eye immediately, they'll come back later with a stronger nudge to get you to look at them again. Here's the thing with these things: If you feed them with the same thing over and over again, all they are is a feed of what you've fed them before. They can't keep up unless they are kept clear of all the information that makes up your life. You need to make your feed as efficient as possible. For those who are not aware, by now you've probably heard the term "social media" being thrown around. Social media is basically a system where its users get to create their own profiles, upload different types of content, and get in touch with each other. Nowadays, it has become one of the most popular bases for people to make friends, promote their products or services, market themselves, and even get new job opportunities.
